Objection Handling

Remote Roles · What to say when they push back

Use these anywhere in the call. After every response, go straight back to the next question in the script — don't wait to be invited.

The shape is always the same: acknowledge it, give them one reason to keep talking, then ask the next question in the same breath.

“How did you get my number?”

“Fair question. Property records in [City] are public, and your name is on the one at [Street Name]. I'm not trying to bother you — I wanted to see whether you'd ever consider an offer on it.”

“If you'd rather not hear from us I'll take you off right now. Otherwise — how many bedrooms is it?”

Why: Be straight. Never invent a source. If they ask to come off the list, that's a yes, not a negotiation.

“You've got the wrong person”

“Sorry about that. Just so I fix our records — am I speaking with [First Name], and have you ever owned the place on [Street Name]?”

Wrong person: "Thanks, I'll get that updated. Do you own anything else you'd consider selling?"

They know the owner: "No problem. If you speak to them, a group of local buyers is looking at the property." Don't ask for personal details.

Why: Don't argue with them. Mark the record as bad data and move on.

“I'm not interested”

“Understood, and I'm not going to push. Most people say that first time round. The only reason I keep going is the timeline — we close up to six months out, so you'd take the offer now and pick the date later. No obligation either way.”

“Two quick things about the house and I'll know whether it's even worth a number. How many beds?”

Why: One soft re-ask. That's it. A second no ends the call politely — pushing past it costs you the referral and the reputation.

“Who is this? Is this a scam?”

“Good instinct to ask. I work with a group of local buyers — we buy as-is and cover closing costs. I'm collecting a few details so a specialist can follow up, and I won't ask you for anything sensitive.”

“They'll give you the full company details before you decide anything. What shape is the property in, one to ten?”

Why: Never sound offended. Someone who asks this is engaged — they're still on the phone.

“What's your offer?”

“That's what I'm trying to work out. The number depends on the house, so — one to ten, what condition is it in?”

Why: Never guess a figure. A number you invent becomes the number they expect, and the specialist has to walk it back.

“I need to think about it”

“Of course. What part would you want to think over? I might be able to clear it up now.”

Why: This is rarely a no. It's usually one unanswered question wearing a coat.

“Take me off your list”

“Done — I'm removing you now. Sorry to have bothered you. Have a good day.”

Why: End the call. Do not re-ask, do not offer anything, do not get curious about whether they'd sell one day. Log the removal immediately. This one is a legal obligation, not a sales decision, and ignoring it puts the whole company at risk.

The two rules under all of it

- Acknowledge before you answer. People stop listening the moment they feel argued with.
- Finish on a question. An answer that ends in a full stop ends the call.
